Rust Training

So this past weekend, I was able to get free enterprise level commercial training in the Rust programming language valued at several thousand dollars. It was taught by a principal level software engineer just like Johnathan. The training was one weekend day. The trainer said that it would take anywhere from 3 to 4 hours, however the training actually ended in 2.5 hours.

After spending 2.5 hours, the training was neither enterprise nor commercial level in my opinion. Also, after the training had ended, I could not write one line of rust code and looking at the expression of the attendees on their webcam, I would safely say the same for them.

The trainer wanted us to promote his rust training but in all honesty I cannot. The trainer also wanted feedback and I was going to send him a very long and detailed email telling him how he should have taught and trained and I got the impression that he was not going to do it and not change.

This gave me the idea to come up with my own rust training which would be at least 10X better than his.

If there are no objections, I would like to offer my training as a series of one day 40 minute classes. The initial class would be free and each class would be 40 minutes because that is how much free zoom time that is available. I would charge $99 per attendee but for Johnathan and Josh, all training would be free of charge if you guys are interested. I would like to offer the training sometimes during the new meetup venture times of Mondays and Wednesdays but not twice a week but only once a week and sometimes.
